DRESS FOR ALL OCCASIONS.

Society Women Not Given Up to Thoughts of Their Attire.

Philadelphia Times, In touching upon the subject of dress there is no wish to dictate in a matter that must necessarily be governed by time, and place, and means, and possibilities. It may to peruse these lines to know that among the "loaders" they perchance read of in the bewildering columns of "society" description there are many who appear time after time in the same gown without giving a thought to it after they come into the room. These women are constantly amused and surprised by reading details of their costumes reported to have been worn on such and such occasionsaccounts so varied from the fact they can only put down to the good nature of the reporter, who desires, perhaps, to supply the variety they would like to see. Life is too full for a woman of good sense and means and assured position in a large community to permit her, if there was no higher reason, to be forever turning over stuffs, and planning different outfits for herself. By the time the necessary provision for her own and her daughters' wardrobes are complete, in spring and autumn, she is aweary in spirit and body, and ready never to hear of finery again. She puts on her evening frock, and goes out, night after night, to dinner, and to sit against the wall while her daughter dances, longing, most often, to exchange it for something loose, and light, and easy-for a comfortable chair and a pleasant book at home. Far from her thoughts is the con-(similarly employed.) The younger women vho are dancing and passing back and forth in the promenade, are too busy and self-absorbed to take in the details of each other's gowns. In the ceaseless whirl of a large society these matters are far less discussed than in a village or country neighborhood. One generally hears the dress question disposed of as "such a bore, and it takes so much good time that might be spent enjoying one's self." But while such a woman of society does not make dress her chief object, she is ordinarily anxious it should be well chosen, lous, striking in refinement and in style and, above all, not overdone. She looks with disapproval on the modes likely to become too popular and vulgarized bethe garments illustrating them shall have gone the way of all garments. She eschews "loud" patterns, conspicuous sleeves and capes, and hats, such as one sees by the million in the thoroughfares of a great city, made up in cheap materials. She would no more be seen in these than in hair made artificially blonde and pierced behind with an arrow set with artificial

For her carriage she reserves the French gown sent out from a great maker, which may be so much in advance of the prevalent fashion as to be conspicuous. She would not walk abroad in it any more than she would wear over muddy crossings a white petticoat frilled and trimmed with lace. For the street she sets aside a dark, trim, stylish gown, and coat, and hat, which may reveal its artificer and value to the initiated eye, but will never invite attention from the crowd.

The young girl of the same class is easily recognized by distinguished simplicity in dress. The costliness of her appareling appears in stuff, cut and the indefinable appurtenance of style. The linings and unseen parts of her costumes are oftentimes of better material than that used for the of better material than hat used for the exterior. Her trimmings are few, and those put only where trimmings have a natural right to be. She wears no jewelry other than a necessary clasp or pin, omitting bracelets and bangles, long since relegated to the habitues of cheap thoes and remote avenues. In damp weather one sees this girl of society walking in a skirt that clears the ground, thick boots, a petticoat of dark silk or stuff, a jacket, or coat, or cape that suggests utility, and carrying a sensible umbrella.

Whatever the women of the world (so-called) have to be reproached with in the manner of bringing up their children, they do not, nowadays, neglect considerations of health, either in exercise or in appropriate dress to meet the varieties of the American climate. It may be that this habit of compact simplicity in outdoor dress is one of the benefits we brive from our supposed cult of English ways cult of English ways.

One is struck in visiting in English country houses with the custom universal among the women of wearing all day the plain tailor-made tweeds they appear in at breakfast, ready to walk about the grounds afterward. In the evening, at a dinner later than is usual with us, they emerge resplendent in jewels and low-cut gowns, even when the house party is a small one. In contrast, we see in America women and girls wearing at breakfast confections of pink or blue, covered with lage, in which it would be impossible, with the necessary equipment of slippers and lace-edged skirts, to do more than step off a veranda upon a gravel walk. If they go out it is generally after 11 o'clock, and, after a second elabo rate toilet, to make calls or to drive. Low-cut gowns-now so universally in us in evening dress that they have ceased to be a vexed question—should be worn neither by light of day nor by people they do not be-come. It is lamentable to see women whose atomy rebels against exposure equip emselves, for fashion's sake, in such wise, ot only is attention called to the want of thin face and throat are generally much improved by the fluffiness of lace or feathers rising almost to the chin. And there is a wide latitude allowed in this mafter among who have not a queen to lay down the law of exclusion from her presence on state occasions of those who are not fortified by a physician's certificate to excuse a dress from high in the throat. A low-cut gown hould not be allowed to show itself at any function of the afternoon, even in the armust appear in street costumes with bon-nets should indicate to the hostess the proprie'y of a house dress high in the throat. And, although afternoon receptions may still be given where the gas is turned on and the daylight shut out and a number of women, convened to aid in receiving, assemble in full evening dress to claim the admiration of their friends, it is not in the best houses they are seen.

From Various Sources. Many grotesque styles masquerade these days as alleged colonial fashions. Dealers say the pointed shoes have reached the limit, and will now decline. Whaleboned skirts necessitate a peculiar walk on the part of those who wear them. Lace and embroidered chiffon are prodigal-y used for decorating the bodices of eventoilettes of every description. The rose and reseda shades, used separately or in combination, have lost none of their popularity. On the contrary, they appear to gain in favor continually. For street wear haircloth has superseded he silk petticoat. It must be made from our and a half to five yards around, and within an inch of the bottom of your dress. For those who are out a great deal, and wish to diminish the weight of their garments, black equestrian tights may be drawn over the underwear, thereby dis-arding unnecessary skirts. The up-to-date skirt for evening wear is made of the finest linen lawn, profusely trimmed with clusters of fine tucks and lace and narrow ribbon. You may wear three of these if you can afford to.

Accordion-pleated skirts in silk, liberty atin, chiffon, and net are still very fashionable. Some of these show two of three rows of rather wide moire ribbon carried in and out the meshes as a border. A handsome dinner gown is made of brocade silk in the red peach shade, and trimmed with a black feather band around the skirt. Black velvet ribbon forms the belt, finished on the right side with a bow, and extends to the bottom of the skirt. where it ends in another bow. The low-cut neck is filled in with black lace, and lace forms the bertha, which is headed with the ribbon and a bow on one shoulder. A youthful and simple evening dress is of white striped gauze over white taffeta silk. The gauze skirl is slightly fulled at the waist and vary wide at the bottom, where it is trimmed with a soft twist of the same knotted at intervals. Rose pink satin ribbon forms the rosettes across the neck the straps over the shoulders, and the belt with long ends and bows, which reach to the bottom of the skirt in front and back

The width of the dress skirt varies greatly. No two are just alike. Certain details are followed, but the skirts differ in the number of gores, in the width at the foot, and in their adjustment, various materials requiring different modes of manipulation, different ways of shaping for street, even-ing or general wear, and the modiste settles the question of steels, featherbone, haircloth, fiber chamois, canvas, silk or crinoline in the making up of each gown for each special wearer.

The Trick of Resting.

Few women know how to rest as they should. They think that they must undress and go to bed to be thoroughly comfortable. This is a mistake, provided there is a tabouret or little footstool in the room on which the feet may rest while the other part of the body is supported by a chair. You can rest and rest most comfortably in this fashion, and let it be whispered right here among ourselves that if we want to gain a maximum of rest in a minimum of time we should copy the in-elegant but healthful trick of the masculine drones and put our feet occasionally higher than our heads. Fashionable women, to whom the necessity of never showing fatigue and of ever looking their best has taught this knack, fall into this posture whenever they are in the seclusion of their

The Indianapolis Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, celebrated the the "Boston tea party" last night at the residence of Mrs. M. E. Vinton. The house was decorated in the association colors, blue and white, interspersed with the American flag. The refreshment table, with its dainty appointments in rare old blue its dainty appointments in rare old blue and white china and Wedgewood ware, was presided over by Mrs. W. F. Winchester, assisted by Misses Mary Sloan, Mary Sayles and Eloise Morton. Mrs. C. C. Foster read a paper on the "History of the National Organization." Conversation followed, led by Mrs. Mary Harrison McKee. Mrs. C. F. Sayles gave an historical sketch of the Boston tea party. Conversation was led by Mrs. George W. Sloan, and specimens of revolutionary "homespun," a quaint, clumsy old wooden shuttle, and portions of a "flax hackle" were exhibited by Mrs. Winchester. Miss Eliza Browning gave an account of her trip over the revolutionary battlefields.

Mrs. J. R. Lilly rendered patriotic airs on
